Body Shop

You have the right to choose your body shop to complete your repairs to your vehicle. Body shops are trained, equipped, and licensed to repair vehicles. You trust that your body shop will repair your vehicle to pre-loss condition. Since the body shop is ultimately liable for the repairs, they need to ensure all necessary operations of the repair are completed. I think it is safe to say that they will fix your vehicle the same way they would fix their family's vehicle. Understandably, they also need to be paid for their services.

Short-Pay Claims

If the repair process wasn't enough, you are probably feeling like you are put in the middle of your body shop and your insurance company. The truth is...you are being put in the middle of it. The body shop that you choose to do the repairs on your vehicle is invoicing for the work needed to be completed. Your insurance company is telling you that the body shop is charging you things that are not covered under the policy. You are now officially dealing with a short pay claim. The decisions you make now will not only save you stress, but it will also save you money.

Insurance Adjuster

Your insurance company has a contract with you in the form of a policy. Your policy explains exactly what is covered in the event of a loss. You are likely right in believing that you should only owe your deductible. Insurance companies are professionals at paying claims. They are not trained to repair vehicles. To maximize profits for the insurance company, adjusters are trained to minimize the payout on losses. The insurance company is not liable if they didn't pay you for the full repair. Thus, adjusters have a biased opinion of how a vehicle should be repaired.
